

Globalization: Super Exploitation and Capitalism's Final Crisis

Globalization is a complex and multifaceted process that has been underway for centuries. However, it is only in recent decades that its full implications have become apparent. Globalization has led to increased interconnectedness and interdependence among countries and economies. This has had a profound impact on the global economy, as well as on the lives of workers and communities around the world.

Super Exploitation

One of the most significant consequences of globalization has been the rise of super exploitation. Super exploitation is a term used to describe the extreme levels of exploitation that workers in developing countries are subjected to. This exploitation is often characterized by low wages, poor working conditions, and a lack of basic rights. Super exploitation is a direct result of the global capitalist system, which pits workers in different countries against each other in a race to the bottom.

The rise of super exploitation has had a devastating impact on the lives of workers in developing countries. It has led to increased poverty, inequality, and social unrest. Super exploitation has also contributed to the erosion of democracy and the rise of authoritarianism in many countries.

Capitalism's Final Crisis

The rise of super exploitation is a symptom of a deeper crisis within the capitalist system. Capitalism is a system based on the exploitation of labor. This exploitation is necessary for the system to generate profits. However, as the system expands, it becomes increasingly difficult to find new sources of profit. This leads to a tendency for the rate of profit to fall.

The falling rate of profit is a major contradiction within the capitalist system. It is a contradiction that cannot be resolved within the system itself. This is because the only way to increase the rate of profit is to increase the exploitation of workers. However, this leads to social unrest and political instability. Ultimately, the falling rate of profit will lead to the collapse of the capitalist system.

Globalization has led to increased super exploitation of workers and the deepening of the capitalist crisis. This is a process that is unsustainable. It will ultimately lead to the collapse of the capitalist system. The only way to avoid this collapse is to build a new system that is based on the principles of solidarity and cooperation.
