Bly's writing quickly garnered attention for its sharp wit, fearless reporting, and fearless advocacy for the marginalized. She fearlessly exposed the corruption and exploitation that plagued the city's working class, earning her both praise and scorn.

Undercover Investigation at Blackwell's Island:

In 1887, Bly embarked on one of her most famous investigations, an undercover assignment at the notorious Blackwell's Island Insane Asylum. Pretending to be mentally ill, she spent ten days in the asylum, documenting the appalling conditions, abuse, and neglect faced by its inmates.

Her harrowing account, published in the New York World as "Ten Days in a Mad-House," sent shockwaves through society and led to sweeping reforms in the treatment of mental illness. Bly's exposé became a model for investigative journalism, proving that reporters could bring about meaningful change by immersing themselves in the lives of the marginalized.

Around the World in 72 Days:

Inspired by Jules Verne's "Around the World in Eighty Days," Bly embarked on a daring adventure to circumnavigate the globe in a record-breaking time. In 1889, she set off from New York City on a journey that took her across five continents and two oceans.

During her travels, Bly encountered a diverse array of cultures, customs, and challenges. She faced bandits in Mexico, rode elephants in India, and witnessed the grandeur of the Great Wall of China. Her dispatches from around the world were eagerly anticipated by readers, who were captivated by her vivid descriptions and fearless spirit.

Championing Women's Rights:

Throughout her career, Bly was a vocal advocate for women's rights. She used her platform to challenge societal norms, expose the injustices faced by women, and inspire a new generation of feminists.

In 1895, she ran for Mayor of New York City, becoming the first woman to run for such a high office. While she did not win, her campaign signaled the growing political consciousness of women in America.

Later Years and Legacy:

Bly continued to write and lecture throughout her life. She covered the Spanish-American War as a war correspondent and later established her own magazine, The Woman's Home Companion.
