Identification

The first step in developing student leadership is to identify potential leaders. This can be done through a variety of methods, including:

- Observation: Teachers and administrators can observe students in the classroom, on the playground, and in other settings to identify those who exhibit leadership qualities.
- Nomination: Students can be nominated for leadership positions by their teachers, peers, or parents.
- Self-nomination: Students can also self-nominate for leadership positions.
- Assessment: There are a number of assessment tools that can be used to identify student leadership potential.

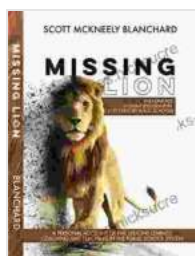

Once potential leaders have been identified, it is important to provide them with opportunities to develop their leadership skills. This can be done through a variety of programs and activities, including:

- Leadership training: Schools can offer leadership training programs that teach students about the principles of leadership and provide them with opportunities to practice their skills.
- Mentoring: Students can be mentored by teachers, administrators, or other community members who can provide them with guidance and support.
- Student government: Student government is a great way for students to develop their leadership skills by participating in the decision-making process of their school.
- Extracurricular activities: Extracurricular activities, such as sports, clubs, and music, can provide students with opportunities to develop their leadership skills by taking on leadership roles within their chosen activity.

In addition to providing opportunities for development, it is also important to support student leaders. This can be done by providing them with the resources they need to be successful, such as access to leadership training, mentoring, and support from teachers and administrators. It is also important to create a school climate that is supportive of student leadership, where students feel empowered to take on leadership roles and are recognized for their contributions.

The hunt for student leadership in 21st century public schools is a critical one. By identifying, developing, and supporting student leaders, schools can create a more positive and productive learning environment for all students.
